At the beginning of every school year, a new crop of 15-year-olds pile into my classroom. Some are excited for the new year, while others are unmotivated. Regardless of their attitude, I'm always embarrassed to admit I am scared.

Just fake (假装) it until you make it, my fellow teachers advised. But no matter how much I faked it, and how many years spent teaching the same course, the fear has continued. As the relationships with my students deepen, I naturally grow comfortable, but even then, I feel nervous when something unexpected happens in class.

One might expect that this would cause me to be ashamed, to practice even harder, or to study public speaking methods. But I have learned another way.

This year, I was given a group of 10th graders, and on the first day of class, over half shared in their self-introduction paragraph that they were shy and afraid to speak up in class. My replies on their papers were personal: Did you notice how I held my hands to keep them from shaking today? Did you hear how my voice trembled when I noticed everyone looking at me?

And slowly but surely, my students began to open up about the root of their fears. When they saw me, their experienced teacher, trembling, they had more courage during their presentation. When they heard me stumble (磕绊) over my words, they accepted their own pauses trying to find the right ones.

Fear of public speaking rarely goes away completely. So many students are silenced by it in the classroom, but we as teachers have the chance to encourage by leading with empathy instead of pushing or disappointment. That starts with finding the courage to be honest about our own flaws (瑕疵). We must then teach ourselves, and by extension, our students to reframe those flaws as strengths rather than weaknesses.

24. What does the author say about her fear of public speaking?

A. It becomes easier to hide with practice.

B. It prevents her from teaching effectively.

C. It remains despite her teaching experience.

D. It appears when students are less motivated.

25. How did the author deal with her fear this year?

A. She studied public speaking skills.

B. She used it to bond with her students.

C. She switched to a different course.

D. She asked her fellow teachers for advice.

26. How were the students affected by the author's change?

A. They became brave speakers.

B. They lost respect for her.

C. They found their own flaws.

D. They made academic progress.

27. What message does the author want to express?

A. Fear is only as deep as the mind allows.

B. Profession is more important than honesty.

C. Sharing personal struggles can empower others.

D. Public speaking skills make a successful teacher.

If you lack time to exercise during the working week, don't worry. A study of nearly 90,000 participants in the UK suggests that putting all your weekly exercise on weekends still has significant health benefits compared with being inactive. In this study, participants who cram all their recommended weekly physical activity into one or two days are referred to as "weekend warriors".

The researchers collected data from 89,573 volunteers by requiring them to wear a wrist (手腕) device to track their weekly physical activity. These participants were then divided into three groups based on their exercise patterns: regular exercisers, who spread their exercise throughout the week; weekend warriors, who did most of their exercise in one day or two; and inactive participants. After grouping the participants, the researchers compared their health records to examine the related health benefits.

The study found that, compared with those who were inactive, weekend warriors and regular exercisers experienced similar health benefits, with both groups having a lower risk of developing more than 200 diseases. Specifically, the strongest effects were for cardiometabolic diseases. Both groups had a 20% lower risk of high blood pressure and a 40% lower risk of diabetes.

Dr. Shaan Khurshid, a cardiologist at Massachusetts general hospital in Boston, who led the study, said, "It shows that, for health benefits, it's really the amount of physical activity rather than its frequency that matters. The key is, however you are going to get that amount, do it in the way that works for you."

Khurshid also mentioned the need for more research to explore whether the "weekend warrior" workout pattern could help people reach their activity goals more easily. "It might be more convenient for some people and help them follow public health advice better," he said.

28. What does the underlined word "cram" in paragraph 1 probably mean?

A. Pack. B. Break. C. Divide. D. Turn.

29. How did the researchers test the health benefits in the three groups?

A. By checking their physical health.

B. By comparing their health records.

C. By reviewing their exercise records.

D. By examining their workout patterns.

30. According to Dr. Khurshid, what is more important for health benefits?

A. How often you exercise each week.

B. How long you exercise each time.

C. How much exercise you do each week

D. How much effort you put into exercise.

31. What can we infer about the "weekend warrior" workout pattern?

A. It follows public health advice.

B. It might suit people with busy schedules.

C. It could help people reach their workout goals.

D. It will soon be promoted as the best exercise plan.

D

Classics are the gems (宝石) of the literary world. For years, people have read them to gain knowledge. But now, an increasing number of people enjoy these classics in online video series.

According to a 2023 report by the Chinese short-video platform Douyin, the views for book-related videos jumped by 65.17 percent year-on-year. As people become busier in competitive social environments, the brief literary explanations provided in short videos enable some to experience stories from a fresh perspective in fleeting moments. "I watch them on the subway, in a queue or before bed. Short videos combine text, images and expressions, providing a better experience than just reading text alone," a man surnamed Yang told Xinhua.

The fearsome length and complexity of classics are also reasons why some people, especially teenagers, are turning to literature vloggers (video bloggers) for help. A Dream of Red Mansions is well-known for its detailed description of Chinese society, colorful characters and poetic language. It explores themes like family, society and human nature. However, these very qualities make the novel difficult for some students, who find it boring or even sleep-inducing. "There are so many characters in the novel, which confused me a lot," said 12-year-old Shao Xinyan from Hubei. "Some vloggers use a mind map to clearly show their relationship."

While reading with videos helps many people, some express different opinions and concerns. For Zhang Boren, a 13-year-old from Beijing, reading is a journey in which people form a personal connection with the text, not just absorbing facts. "Books that inspire my imagination, like fantasy adventures and historical stories, demand a deeper connection. Videos, although convenient, can't fully present the small details of a well-written story," said Zhang. Wang Hongjie, an 18-year-old girl, from Sichuan agreed, saying, "It may decrease readers' ability to read independently and think deeply."

32. Why do more people turn to short videos for classic literature?

A. Short videos save time and offer a better reading experience.

B. Classic books are often too out-of-date to be popular.

C. They're not interested in reading independently.

D. Video platforms provide more book-related content.

33. What makes A Dream of Red Mansions difficult for some students?

A. Its detailed descriptions and social qualities.

B. Its focus on ancient social culture in China.

C. Its elegant language and various characters.

D. Its unique writing features and target readers.

34. What can be inferred about Wang Hongjie from the last paragraph?

A. She thinks videos help readers understand classics better.

B. She disagrees with Zhang Boren's opinion on videos.

C. She suggests readers watch videos for a deeper connection.

D. She believes reading independently is a skill worth keeping.

35. What can be a suitable title for the text?

A. "Update" the Videos

B. "Watch" the Classics

C. "Read" Literature

D. "Play" with Vlog

Ways to Combat Phone Addiction

Many people struggle with smartphone addiction. They constantly check notifications (通知) and feel restless without their devices. Too much screen time can increase stress and anxiety. ___36___ Here are several practical ways to reduce your screen time.

● Adjust phone settings. Start by turning off notifications during work or study hours, because warnings are a major source of distraction. ___37___ For example, try removing the apps you don't use every day and put only your most important apps on the first page. You can also enable grayscale (灰度) mode on your phone. This simple change will make the phone look less attractive so that you may use it less often.

● Create phone-free zones. Choose certain rooms in your house as phone-free zones. The bedroom is a great place to start, as avoiding phones there can improve your sleep quality. Besides, the dining room is another good choice. ___38___

● Find alternative activities. It's much easier to reduce phone use if you have other things to do. Try hobbies that keep your hands busy, such as painting, knitting, or doing puzzles. Physical activities are also very helpful. ___39___ Reading books is another excellent choice, as it helps improve your focus without the endless distractions of a digital screen.

● ___40___ Try to gradually reduce your phone use over a month. Start by setting specific goals, like limiting screen time to two hours a day. Use tracking apps to monitor your progress each day and see how much you're using your phone. By finding activities to replace your phone time, you can break bad habits and feel more in control. Thirty days from now, you'll be glad you started.

A. Track your phone usage.

B. Try a 30-day phone-free challenge.

C. Therefore, it's important for you to find a healthy balance.

D. Creating a more straightforward home screen is another smart move.

E. Next, turn off all non-essential notifications and create phone-free zones.

F. A simple walk, or practicing yoga can boost your mood and reduce stress.

G. This will help encourage more face-to-face conversations with your family.

My Favorite Place on Campus

Tucked away beside the teaching building, the small garden is my favorite place on campus. Although it is not large, its shady trees, winding path and seasonal flowers make it feel peaceful.

What draws me there most is the sense of calm it offers. After a demanding class, a few quiet minutes on the bench helps me clear my mind and regain energy. It is also where my friends and I exchange ideas, encourage one another and sometimes plan class activities.

To me, the garden is more than a beautiful corner; it is a place where both friendships and confidence quietly grow.

听力原文：

Text 1

M: Last weekend I went to the sports center to go running and ran into Louis. He was practicing volleyball.

W: I also started to exercise recently. I was skipping rope at home.

Text 2

M: Betty, are you excited about your upcoming vacation?

W: I can't wait for it to come! I'm leaving this Friday. I was supposed to leave tomorrow, but something came up, so I had to postpone it until the day after.

Text 3

M: The flight to Sydney was quite long, wasn't it?

W: Yes. It's a good thing we didn't take the train. How about we rent a car later so we can explore the city more easily?

Text 4

M: Do you know Joe Anderson?

W: Sure, he is famous at our school for winning first place in the writing competition.

M: Yes, that's him. He also got elected as the president of the students' union.

W: Wow, that's impressive.

Text 5

M: Ava, remember to pick up our clothes at the dry cleaner on your way home.

W: Sure. And I'm going to stop by the grocery store. Is there anything you'd like to eat?

M: It's up to you to decide.

Text 6

W: Honey, I've got to take you to the hospital right now.

M: It's nothing—just a little pain in my elbow and leg.

W: That fall sounded terrible. I even heard it from our bedroom.

M: I'm sure it's nothing serious. I'll just take a couple of painkillers and walk it off. I have a really important meeting today.

W: You can't work in the shape you're in. I must take you to the hospital for a check-up.

M: All right. Get the car key, if you insist.

Text 7

M: Have you ever thought about how much you actually speak? How many words do you use in a day?

W: Not really, I think the amount we speak has a lot to do with our jobs, who we live with, and our personalities.

M: But I think it depends a lot on personalities. In the past, it was thought that women speak much more than men. Recently I read a study that suggested men and women actually speak about the same amount each day. However, what they talk about is different.

W: How so?

M: The researchers found that women talk more about people and relationships, while men talk more about sports, numbers and small tools.

Text 8

W: I can't stand being away from Lucky for two weeks. Can't we bring her along?

M: We've talked about this before. Our dog is not suitable for traveling. She'll bark. We have to deal with emergencies from time to time.

W: I'm afraid she'll have separation anxiety.

M: Are you talking about the dog or yourself? Come on, she'll be fine at the pet shop.

W: She'll be stressed out the whole time.

M: I know it's hard to leave her behind. If you're worried, why not take Lucky to Grandma's?

W: That's perfect. Grandma especially loves her.

M: OK. Now I'll call Grandma, and you go to pack your bags.

Text 9

W: Hey, I was just reading about how different sports are popular in different countries. It's fascinating how cultural preferences shape that.

M: Oh, for sure! Like in the United States, American football and basketball are huge. The Super Bowl is a major event.

W: Right. But if we go to Brazil, soccer is the heartbeat of the nation. The way they play is so expressive and skillful.

M: And let's not forget cricket in India. It's not just a sport; it's almost a religion.

W: Absolutely. And then there's tennis in Australia. The Australian Open is one of the Grand Slams, and it's a huge deal every year.

M: True. And in China, table tennis is incredibly popular. It's seen as a national sport, and they dominate internationally.

W: That's interesting because it's not as mainstream elsewhere. And in Spain, bullfighting has a unique appeal, despite the argument.

M: It's definitely a cultural and grand event, though it's not for everyone. It's these unique appeals that make sports so special in different parts of the world. They reflect the spirit and values of the people.

Text 10

M: Welcome to The Teachers' Room, the show all about teaching practice. The first day with a new class can be scary! Let's talk about three things you can do with a new class. First, break the ice. Icebreakers are a fantastic way to help a new group come together. They should allow everyone to participate without feeling embarrassed. For example, one idea is "What's in Your Schoolbag?" Ask students to empty their schoolbags to find an object that is significant to them. Let the group guess why each object is significant before the owner explains its importance. Second, the first day is also perfect for a needs analysis. It lets you understand what your students expect to do. You can hand out cards with topics, vocabulary groups, or skills on them. And then have students rank them in order of what they'd like to focus on. Lastly, it is important to establish class rules on the first day. You should get students to debate some rules for the class. This approach gets them invested in the class, gives them some responsibility, and makes them more likely to follow the rules. Thank you for joining us in The Teachers' Room, and we hope these tips help make your first day with a new class a success!
